

Kate Poland

Little Egret, Osea, 2017

Linoprint

13 x 8 cms

My habit as a print-maker is to look at the ordinary, unnoticed or unseen and make it more visible. I do this by changing the scale of an object or just shifting my perspective. I make a runner bean into a planet, a courgette into a map, draw road maps of journeys based on the bumps in the road, rather than map co-ordinates, or make prints from etching plates buried in the ground. I'm currently working on a series of prints from plates buried in English battlefields – and even experimenting with representative art!

www.katepoland.com